

Gwinnett eateries reinvent selves as soup kitchen, pantry

Good Word Brewing, Universal Joint step up amid coronavirus crisis.

By Amanda C. Coyne

Amanda.Coyne@ajc.com

Two Gwinnett County restaurants have pivoted to help their neighbors after closing to dine-in customers because of the coronavirus pandemic.

Good Word Brewing, a downtown Duluth brewpub, has stopped serving its regular menu altogether. For more than a week, the restaurant has been operating as a soup kitchen for whoever needs a meal. Head brewer Todd DiMatteo has switched from brew-

Todd DiMatteo

master to soup master.

While still serving to-go meals, Universal Joint in downtown Lawrenceville has tried to transform itself into a contactless one-stop shop. Customers can order pounds of ground beef, bags of produce and rolls of toilet paper from the restaurant's "pantry" alongside takeout orders, family-size meals and to-go beer and wine. Employees load everything into a customer's trunk or back seat

Restaurants continued on B4

cvd_469

Clipped By:
relianceenwerem
Mar 30, 2026